ABOUT YOUR COURSE

The Master of Public Health (MPH) is a forward-thinking course designed to equip you with the insight, skills and confidence to tackle some of the most pressing health challenges of our time.

Rooted in global and local perspectives, the programme explores key areas including epidemiology, global health systems, leadership, innovation and health promotion. It encourages critical thinking and creativity, preparing you to analyse complex health issues and shape evidence-informed solutions that improve health outcomes and reduce inequalities.

One of the programme's strengths is its emphasis on developing leadership and research capability. You will investigate real-world health issues through a major research project, engage in lively debate and case-based learning, building your understanding of the political, ethical, and economic forces that shape public health.

The course attracts students from a wide range of professional and academic backgrounds, creating a stimulating environment where diverse viewpoints enrich discussion and deepen learning. While the teaching is delivered in person, your experience is enhanced by access to a virtual learning environment and a rich set of resources to support independent study.

Whether you aim to work in policy, advocacy, research, education, or frontline services, this programme will support your development as a reflective, skilled, and socially responsible public health professional.

Your course leader is Marianthi Alexandropoulou who can be contacted via marianthi.alexandropoulou@bnu.ac.uk.
